Subject: Pool Industry Duped - Pool Owners Scammed

Years ago, pool service techs learned that aggressive water etches quality plaster surfaces uniformly - that it does not pick and choose some areas of the surface to etch, while leaving other areas untouched.

The cement/concrete industry documented that improper workmanship practices can cause cement surfaces to mottle, darken, discolor, deteriorate, streak, and spot.

Yet, in the 1980's, when pool plastering companies began seeing white spots in some of their recently plastered pools (white and dark colored), they decided that aggressive water was responsible; rather than poor workmanship. The plasterers even invented the term "spot etching," without any evidence that white spotting was an etching phenomenon at all.

Even after two professional cement analysis labs determined (by 2003) that improper plastering practices actually caused the weaknesses that result in porous white spots developing over time, the National Plasterers Council (NPC) refused to accept that science and decided to sponsor a study on spot etching and other issues at Cal Poly in San Luis Obispo (NPIRC).

Later, the NPC announced that the NPIRC study proved that aggressive water was the primary cause of spot etching. But their claim is incorrect. The NPIRC's test pool experiments proved just the opposite. Some test pools maintained with balanced water developed some white spotting and gray discoloration, and some test pools with aggressive water did not develop any white spotting or gray mottling.

If you have read onBalance's recent (2013) articles titled "White Spotting of Pool Plaster" and "Scientific Evidence of Spotting," you would know that four prominent cement labs and petrographers (with PhD's) have now independently and scientifically determined that improper plastering practices cause white, soft, and porous spotting. The NPC cannot refute those findings.

Many pool industry companies (including reputable plastering companies) donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to the NPC, thinking the NPIRC study would be scientific, non-biased, and credible in finding causes and solutions to plaster problems. Unfortunately, many have been fooled by NPC's claims. What a waste of money; and the NPC/NPIRC study didn't even contain information on proper or improper workmanship practices.

The swimming pool industry has been duped; service techs and pool owners are being deceived, incorrectly blamed, and scammed; sometimes costing them thousands of dollars for a re-plaster, because plasterers with poor workmanship are not being held responsible.

In future email updates, specific details on the actual results of NPC's study and how their conclusions are flawed will be provided, including debunking their (bogus) claims that "aggressive water" also causes gray mottling, shrinkage cracks, flaking, spalling, and calcium nodules to form on plaster cracks.

Industry Duped - Pool Owners Scammed #3

When the NPIRC's Phase 2 report is completely reviewed, it becomes obvious that the conclusions rendered are not supported by the results of their test pool experiments. It appears that the two Cal Poly professors and NPC leaders confused plaster surface weaknesses, discoloration, and degradation (caused by poor workmanship) with uniform etching (caused by aggressive water).

For example, the reports states that Pools 1, 5, 8, and 12 showed signs of "etching deterioration" in just six weeks' time after plastering and filling with water. But those pools did not have aggressive water (negative LSI) during the first six weeks! And Pools 1, 3, 4, 5, and 12 had discoloration, all without the water being aggressive. White soft spots (called "spot etching" by the plasterers) were reported in Balanced Pools 1, 4, 5, and 12 at the fourth month inspection.

A review of the results of Spa 13 and Spa 14 is also revealing. Spa 13 was deemed to be the "Aggressive" spa, and Spa 14 was the "Balanced" spa. But the first four months water test results shows that the water in both spas were virtually identical with balanced and positive LSI numbers.

At the six week and fourth month inspections, the NPIRC claimed that Spa 13 had significant signs of "etching and discoloration," but Spa 14 did not. Shouldn't the condition of both spas have been the same since the water balance was the same? Yet, the NPIRC concluded that aggressive water caused those unsightly issues even though the water was balanced in both spas.

It is very curious that the professors and NPC leaders did not consider improper workmanship practices as causes of the discoloration and degradation of their test pools since the water was balanced with positive LSI's, and especially since the cement/concrete industry has documented issues like this. Did they review the water chemistry data? Were they just unaware of the facts, or was it something else?

The twelve pools and two spas had different plaster finishers working in them. They claimed to have videotaped the plastering. Shouldn't they have reviewed that and learned what went wrong, instead of blaming the water chemistry?
